WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

Moderately strong, gusty westerly winds likely to develop along and east of the Cascade/Sierra crest for a few hours Friday afternoon. Isolated daily thunderstorms and new starts likely Friday into next week over the northern and eastern areas especially, but Significant Fire Potential expected to remain low.

Monsoon moisture is working its way north through California and is most noticeable today in the southern portion of Northern California. A low off the southern California coast will drift north over the next few days and take over our weather pattern and the high pressure currently over the western states weakens. There may be some nocturnal thunderstorms tonight in our western areas and possibly through Friday morning.

Confidence in this happening is not very high so the High Risk for Significant Fire Potential designations for those thunderstorms is marginal. Another weather event the incoming low will bring about is some moderately strong, gusty afternoon winds for our eastern areas Friday afternoon for a few hours.

Otherwise, daily thunderstorms in Northern California will continue, though activity may be minimal today and Friday before the number and areal coverage of thunderstorms increase over the weekend. The isolated and wetter nature of the upcoming thunderstorms will minimize Significant Fire Potential, which will most likely remain below High Risk designation. New fire starts or holdovers and potential for periods of rapid fire spread will continue to be in place, however.

Temperatures will be cooling over the next few days toward more seasonably normal values with hottest inland locations backing off to mostly 100-105 this weekend into next week. Aside from the gusty winds Friday afternoon, daily winds will continue to mostly be relatively light and of locally driven diurnal patterns.

The coastal marine layer remains quite thin North of Cape Mendocino with areas of overnight and morning low clouds south of there. Winds will generally remain light through the end of the week with daily afternoon sea breezes near the coast and some locally gusty afternoon winds in the valleys.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Scattered wet storms today

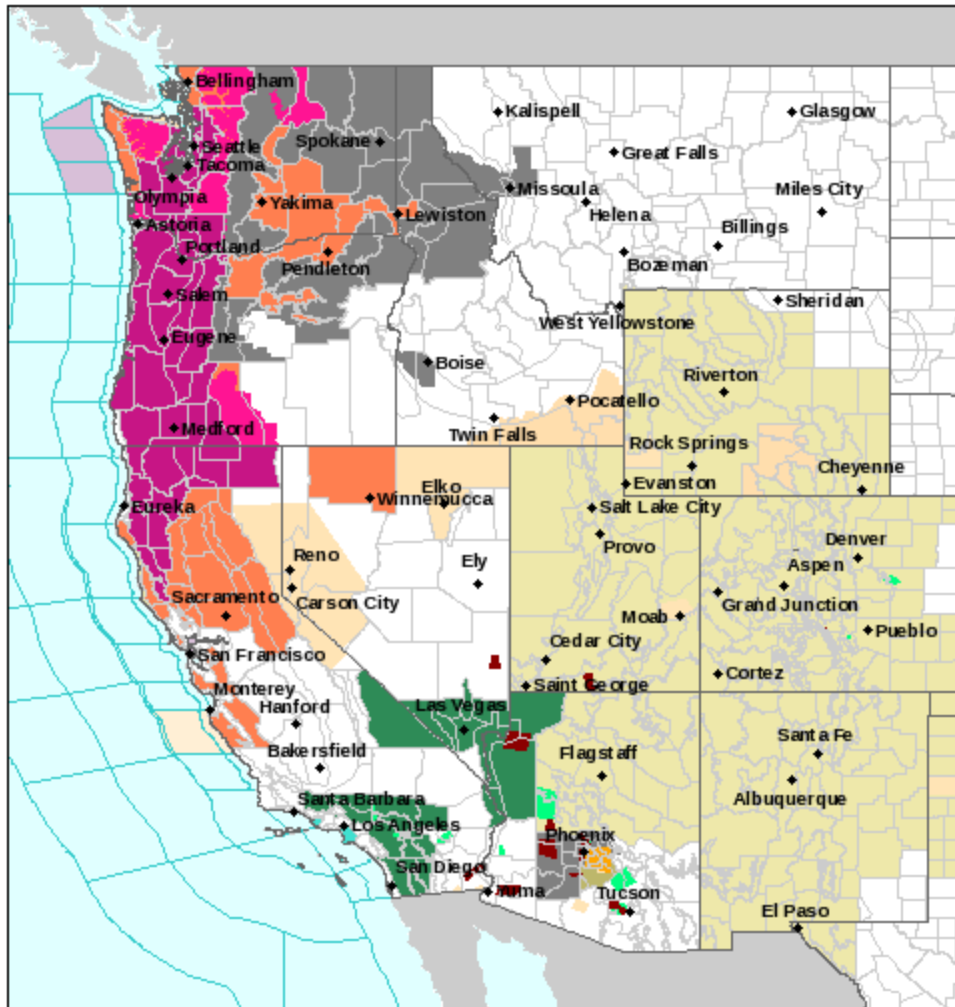

Cooler weather this weekend into the first part of next week

Very humid conditions will continue over Southern California as monsoonal moisture lingers over the area. However, a weak low pressure area approaching the Bay Area will turn the flow aloft to the southwest Friday which should help push the moisture east of the area. Yesterday, widespread wetting rains occurred over the San Bernardino and Cleveland National Forest with scattered convection occurring from Santa Barbara County eastward through Kern County and into the central Mojave Desert. Wetting rains also occurred further north across Yosemite N.P. Over 2" of rain fell near Palomar with other areas seeing, in general, a tenth to a quarter of an inch. Today, storms will be possible in these same areas, but the storms will be most numerous in the desert with fewer storms expected elsewhere compared to Wednesday. The storms may also move slower today which may increase the chance of flooding in recently burned areas. High temperatures will continue to be well above normal with highs up to 105 the central CA interior valleys. Friday, only isolated storms are expected in the Angeles, San Bernardino and Cleveland N.F.'s with most storms remaining in the Sierras and Inyo N.F. Saturday into the first part of next week, scattered showers will develop each afternoon in the Sierras, but the rest of the district should be precipitation-free with relative humidity (RH) levels returning to more normal levels. The marine layer will likely return to the coast by Sunday with stratus becoming quite deep for this time of year by next Monday or Tuesday.
